One point that is brilliantly made by the author is to show the relationship between the Roman, and latter the Byzantne Empires difficulties and the emphasis put on triumphal rulership: the higher the difficulties and the more emphasis on (real or perceived) victories to emphasize and legitimize the Emperor (and, more generally, the leader's) rule. Another of the key points made in the book is the religious dimension that Triumphal Rulership and Eternal Victory had.

Another of the key points made in the book is the religious dimension that Triumphal Rulership and Eternal Victory had. In a way that some might find cynical nowadays, victory equated success, qnd success meant that you had the favour and protection of the Gods, initially, of the Supreme God (during the third century) and then of the unique Christian God, as of the Fourth Century.
